

Oct 13, 1972

Fred C Schwartz

John E Talbert

W. Cecil Steward

Gentlemen; Quite apart from the examination for certification, I am writing to you today on another matter - the use of my book for teaching college and industrial groups.

Before starting this book, I tuned my mind to five questions dictated by need, then stuck doggedly to the task of filling those needs. They were:

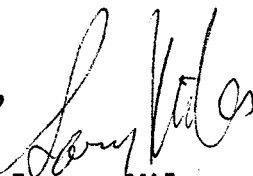

1. Exactly, what is important? Blowing away the chaff, what must be known to allow good ability to produce good VA results?
2. What is the best order of learning?
3. How do we best teach each essential concept and technique?
4. What new approaches have proven themselves? How is it best to include them?
5. How could good teachers of related subject matter, who understandably do not have deep experience in the use of our techniques, be helped to comfortably provide excellent training?

The result was two-fold.

First, the book, which you now have which is available to all.

Second, exact examination questions, which are keyed to each chapter, which will show beyond all question whether the learner has learned the essential material in that chapter, the first five chapters of which are attached hereto. The remainder will come. They have just been assembled. You are the first educators to have them. I sincerely hope, and believe, that you will find them to be very useful.

Sincerely Yours,

Larry Miles