It All “Ads” Up: Women’s Roles in Tobacco Advertising from 1880-1920

Jessica Schummer, University of Wisconsin-Eau Claire, History Department

Research Framework

My research framework lies in the relative categorization of women’s roles in the consumer culture surrounding tobacco from 1880-1920. The bulk of my research encompasses pre-magazine advertising and strives to unpack women’s influences in tobacco advertising and sales. I argue that women’s roles in American tobacco advertising from 1880-1920 quickened the rise of consumer culture, shifted women’s rights issues to the forefront, and caused a lasting social change in accepted morals and values. These roles are fluid, so there are not rigid dates for each, although the instigators role I identify is more prominent pre 1900, whereas models, smokers and purchasers are focused in post 1900 society.

Methodology

For this research, I studied primary sources from 1880-1920, including advertisements, artifacts, correspondence between tobacco companies, and census data from each decade from 1880 1920. After compiling and studying these materials, I researched and reviewed secondary materials and created my research framework and opinions based on this evidence.

Results

Instigators

Women instigated men’s purchases through:

- Creating cigar ribbon quilts
- Scrapbooking with cigarette trade cards
- Collecting flags packaged in cigarettes

Women were persuasive members of their families, convincing men to purchase cigars and other tobacco products in order to gain social status based on items in the packages.

Women used branded cigar ribbons to differentiate social class that tobacco companies had not planned, showing women’s power in shaping pre-magazine advertising.

Smokers

Women began smoking due to:

- Changing political climate (Suffrage Movement)
- Increased feelings of independence due to advertising
- Shift from private to public practice
- Smoking as an “elite” practice: an inexpensive way to appear wealthy
- Young population influenced by advertising

Women smoked privately for many years, but 1910 was a significant turning point for advertisers recognizing the female market. Advertisements from 1910 forward showed women who smoked as elite members of society.

Models

Women as models in tobacco advertising:

- Began in 1880s, but no women holding product until 1900
- Women objectified in ads; something men could “attain”
- New social power due to inclusion in advertising socially “risky” products

Advertisers combated perceptions of women smoking in America, which included poor health, dirtiness, and prostitution. Magazines did that by adding women to their advertising arsenal, placing women in “elite” roles while smoking to create an association between high class and smoking.

Purchasers

Women began purchasing due to:

- Increased marketing of tobacco accessories
- Independence fostered by WWI
- Social acceptability of smoking due to advertising

By 1919, women in New York City were smoking with each other at dinner parties, and in 1922 women in New York City were smoking openly on the streets and at bus stops. The combination of advertising, consumer culture, the First World War, and the women’s suffrage movement allowed women to begin smoking publicly.
